

Indiana's Telephone Privacy law is one of the most effective efforts to obtain public peace with tremendous immediate results favoring of the thousands of Indiana residents. The Telephone Privacy law has dramatically improved my personal and family life by preventing unwanted telemarketing calls which I used to receive 10 or more before the law. By implementing any proposal that would lessen Indiana's Telephone Privacy law's protections, FCC would jeopardize a person's most natural right: sitting at home in peace and not receiving any telemarketing calls.

We're living in a society that every method of getting some information has been heavily commercialized. The companies who will benefit from the proposal lessening the Privacy law's protection have been already reaching their "existing customers" by using all kinds of communications devices such as TV's, the internet, by mail, billboards and hundreds of other way. Let's keep our phones clean from this intrusive marketing. The device called telephone should be something we use for most private and fundamental communications and emergencies. Let's keep it that way. FCC's primary responsibility should be protecting every citizen's right to have at least one communication channel which can be used under total privacy, not proposing opportunities for companies which want to invade our lives with their advertisements.

Sincerely,

Volkan SAHIN
